Spatiotypes and border(s)-discourses: how to think and talk about power facing territories

Fred Hailon

Abstract: This article deals with identity political discourse in situations of cultural movements, precisely in situations of migration. It addresses the question of migration through the interpretation of past and in the making events. In this context, it focuses on the perception of Other, and on its representation. As such, it observes spatioypes in their discursive specificities. Spatioypes are attributions of power and discourse. They state, mentally and politically, the social life of individuals. The corpus is composed of French newspaper articles, from the middle of 2015 to the end of 2016. This period saw the dismantling of the “Camps de Calais” and the distribution of migrants to other locations on the French territory.

Key words: political cognition, identity political discourse, spatioypes, borders and power, migration.
